

French footpath signs (hiking trails) explained

The FFRP (Fédération Française de la Randonnée Pedestre, <https://www.ffrandonnee.fr/>), the equivalent of the Ramblers' Association in the UK or the American Hiking Society in the US, maintains a system of letters and coloured markings which help you find your way across country.

GR route through Grez sur Loing

Footpaths are classified as follows:

GR (Grande Randonnée): Major footpath crossing several regions. Red and white stripe.

GRP (Grande Randonnée de Pays): Major footpath circling an entire region. Red and yellow stripe.

PR (Promenade et Randonnée): Shorter circular routes taking one to eight hours. Yellow stripe.

Two horizontal stripes mean you are on the right path, a horizontal stripe above a right or left angle means turn right or left at the next fork and a horizontal cross means you will stray off the path if you take this route. More unusually, two horizontal stripes with a vertical line through them indicate that the path is a waymarked deviation from the main one.

These waymarked footpaths are shown in red on the IGN (Institut Géographique National) large-scale maps.

On the ground the red and white or yellow markings are deliberately rather discreet, usually painted at eye level on a tree or lamp-post. However, once you start looking for them you will notice them everywhere, including central Paris. It is generally a good idea to follow the FFRP paths, which avoid busy roads as far as possible, sometimes leading to an unsuspected underpass or taking you through a pretty wood.

© Annabel Simms, An Hour From Paris, 2019, p.251

<http://anhourfromparis.com/download-10-new-trips-hour-paris>